Working hard for Broxtowe

September 5 2015

Hello again,
Parliament returns on Monday and no doubt the refugee crisis in the EU will be debated and discussed.

I want to thank everyone who sent me personal emails about the situation and with few exceptions, requests for Britain to do even more. Those pleas were not lost on me nor the Prime Minister, indeed we shared them and I am pleased we have agreed to take thousands of refugees.

However, the harsh reality is that there are some 4 million Syrians who have, understandably, fled their homes to escape the brutality and terror of the Assad regime and in more recent times, Isis. The overwhelming majority are living in refugee camps.

Britain has been the second biggest donor to those camps, to date providing £900 million in aid with a further £100 million pledged. There are for example, almost a million Syrian refugees in Jordan and almost a quarter of the people living in Lebanon are refugees. The situation in Turkey is particularly difficult with one million refugees many of whom are Syrian Kurds. The family of Aylan Kurdi the little boy whose body was discovered on a Turkish beach, had found refuge in Turkey and so it was not surprising their asylum application to Canada was refused. But desperate for the sort of life we enjoy and sometimes perhaps take for granted, they saw their only hope of a future was to come to Europe.

Ensuring no more children drown or suffocate to death in the back of lorries, will take considerably more than our offering to take thousands of refugees. We can only imagine the despair of those who live in a refugee camp because, however much support we give, whilst the camp offers safe shelter it is not home and it offers little hope for the future.

It's a difficult truth but the ultimate solution lies in Syria and the creation of a peaceful, democratic society that protects its people and offers a future to little boys like Aylan Kurdi. In the meantime Britain will continue to play our part in helping Syria's millions of refugees.

As ever,
Anna

Dignity in dying

On Friday Parliament is set to debate a Private Members Bill which would allow someone who has been diagnosed as having less than six months to live, to end their life with medical assistance. This is a very controversial Bill and I would urge you to read it and accompanying documents on the House of Commons web site.

I gave my broad support for a change in the law some years ago. I will be attending the debate and whilst I accept I have not heard all the arguments against the Bill, my inclination is to vote in favour of the Bill. You can be assured I am grateful for all the emails on the subject which I have received and read and will consider all the arguments before voting.

Kimberley School success

Congratulations to everyone at Kimberley School on improved GCSE results this year and another set of excellent A level results details of which I received after my last email newsletter.

Tram looking good

I was on holiday when the tram finally opened to passengers. The view from my office window looks good, with a steady number of passengers. It is to be hoped folk will stop off at Beeston and enjoy the town's excellent shops, pubs, cafes and other businesses.

Stapleford Carnival

It was good to meet so many great organisations enjoying success at today's Stapleford Carnival. Rick Harrington from Forces in the Community, the Beeston based charity to help ex-servicemen and women, was juggling being at Stapleford with events at Tesco's in Toton and Long Eaton. Forces in the Community is one of the charities supported by Broxtowe's Mayor Sue Bagshaw, who also helped open Stapleford Carnival.

Opencast correction

In my last email newsletter I did not explain that Moto, the owners of Trowell services, have agreed to plans to take coal from the planned Shortwood open cast directly onto the M1. This is very good news and I have already met and discussed the proposals with Highways England.

And finally

Congratulations to Borough and Stapleford Town Councillor Richard Macrae on his marriage to Donna. About time too!!
